Bombing survivor finds closure within

Boston. Michele Mahoney was wounded in the Boston Marathon bombing, but bears no malice, nor dwells on the past.

Since twin explosions tore apart her world on April 15, 2013, Michele Mahoney has not only survived, she has flourished.

The 27-year-old lost part of her left leg — though she narrowly avoided the loss of her foot — after the Boston Marathon bombing, a terror attack that claimed the lives of three and the limbs of 16 others at the Boylston Street finish that day.

Since then, Mahoney has dodged the media, and declined requests by federal prosecutors to testify at the looming trial of Dzhokhar Tsarnaev, the 21-year-old college student who, along with his older brother, allegedly carried out the attack.

"I didn't see anything that I thought could help convict [Tsarnaev]," said Mahoney in the campus center of a Boston-area college where she works. "I was completely oblivious to what was going on that day because I was so focused on seeing my friend cross the finish line. And my whole life revolved around this for close to a year while I was doing physical therapy. I just want to get past it. I don't want it to be something that will consume my life."

Mahoney was at the finish line on that fateful day cheering on her roommate Remy Lawler. Her friends, Jeff Bauman and his now-wife Erin Hurley, were by her side, eagerly awaiting that moment when Lawler would cross that iconic line and earn her medal.

A homemade pressure cooker bomb detonated just feet away from her, knocking her to the ground and temporarily deafening her. The muscle on her lower legs was shredded, and her bone was exposed. Her fibula snapped. Her Achilles' tendon was blown out of place. Nearby, a single foot lay atop a bloody sidewalk.

"I was stunned. It happened so fast. I looked around and my eyes locked with a man who was missing his legs, and I realized it was [Bauman]," said Mahoney of her friend, who became the face of bombing survivors when photos surfaced of him being rushed to safety by rescue responders and a cowboy-hat wearing bystander.

Tsarnaev is facing execution in the terror trial, which has stalled in its selection of an impartial jury. Opening statements were originally set to begin Monday, but have been pushed back to an undetermined date.

Mahoney said she will follow the trial, though for the most part she has made a conscious effort not to glue herself to media coverage.

"For me, I'm not looking for any closure through the trial. I think the only person who can provide closure is myself," she said, adding that she harbors no hatred for her alleged attacker, Tsarnaev.

Reliving that day

The two homemade bombs exploded at approximately 2:50 p.m. on April 15, 2013 — 12 seconds apart — near the marathon finish line on Boylston

Street in Boston.

- Three people were killed — two young women and an 8-year-old boy — and 264 others were injured. Sixteen people lost limbs.

- The bombs were contained inside pressure cookers and tucked into two backpacks.

Tsarnaev on trial

The search for justice continues

Dzhokhar Tsarnaev, 21, is on trial for his life, accused of carrying out the attack with his late brother, Tamerlan Tsarnaev.

Opening statements, which were due to begin Monday, have been postponed as jury selection has taken longer than expected.

Tsarnaev's lawyers have on three occasions asked the trial be moved out of Boston on the grounds that Tsarnaev may not receive a fair trial in Boston. Regardless, the trial is happening in federal court in the city.

The court has run into trouble finding objective jurors. More than 1,300 people have been surveyed.

The court said it will announce this week when opening statements will commence.

The trial could run four months.

Massachusetts braces for 'potentially historic blizzard' this week

Snowbound.

With 40 to 60 mph winds, and more than 2 feet of snow predicted, Bostonians need to prepare.

Snow shovels are flying off the shelves. / NICOLAUS CZARNECKI, METRO

State officials are warning of a "potentially major and destructive winter storm" to blanket the area with as much as 3 feet of snow Monday night through Wednesday.

Massachusetts Emergency Management Agency (MEMA) said the storm could be a "potentially historic blizzard."

According to the National Weather Service, snowfall could exceed two feet in some areas of eastern Massachusetts. Inland winds could reach 40 to 60 mph, with winds reaching 60 to 70 mph on the Cape and islands.

Massachusetts Emergency Management Agency expects the strong winds, along with the heavy snow the storm is expected to dump on the region, to cause downed trees, tree limbs, utility poles and wires.

The agency said state residents should brace for widespread power outages and added that travel "may become impossible and life threatening."

The Cape is expected to experience some rain and snow mix. The coast of eastern Massachusetts could see between 18 and 24 inches of snow, according to Rebecca Gould, meteorologist at the National Weather Service's Taunton office. The western parts of Boston, meanwhile, could see as much as 36 inches, she said.

Gould expected the snow to start around the time of Monday's afternoon commute and continue to early Wednesday.

Moderate coastal flooding is expected during high tide early Tuesday morning and late Tuesday afternoon, according to MEMA. Significant beach erosion is also expected.

No Boston Olympics. Referendum would force Boston 2024 to 'engage'

Opponents of the Boston Olympics believe a public referendum is needed to prove that supporters of the city's bid have the citizens' best interests at heart.

Chris Dempsey, co-chairman of No Boston Olympics – the group opposing city's bid to host 2024 bid – said a referendum would “force the boosters to engage with the people rather than what they're doing right now, which is engage with IOC.”

Dempsey's comments were made Sunday on WCVB's On The Record program, where he indicated a “majority of people” think an Olympic ballot question “makes sense.”

Backers of the Olympics have balked at a referendum on the matter, saying they would reach out to affected communities through a series of meetings.

He said both a Boston referendum – that could be on this fall's city ballot – as well as a state-wide referendum in 2016 – “have benefits and make sense.”

He said an earlier ballot could force a conversation about the games sooner, while a statewide ballot would allow all of the state's taxpayers, whom he said could be affected, to weigh in on the issue.

Dempsey said his group was funded through a grass roots network of small donors. DANNY McDONALD

Saving the last of the Northern White Rhinos

Photographer. Ami Vitale shoots for National Geographic and has won numerous awards.

Five years ago, I heard about a plan to airlift four of the last Northern White Rhinos from a zoo in the Czech Republic back to Africa. It sounded like a story line for a Disney film but in reality, it was a desperate, last-ditch effort to save an entire species. There are now only seven of these rhinos left in the world.

Lewa Wildlife Conservancy in Kenya worked hard to make the move possible and the rhinos were flown on a cold, snowy night in December 2009. They landed and were brought to roam "free" on the savannas of Kenya at the Ol Pejeta Conservancy. The hope was then and now to breed them. The air, water, food and room to roam could stimulate them to repopulate Africa by crossbreeding them with Southern White Rhinos to preserve the genes.

Recently, I went back to visit the rhinos who were airlifted. It warmed my heart to see them nuzzling on the open plains, but I was reminded of the tragic truth by the team of armed guards who are there to protect them from poachers. If the current trajectory of death continues, rhinos, elephants and a host of lesser-known plains animals will be functionally extinct in our lifetime. Sophisticated, heavily armed, poaching networks, fueled by demand from newly minted millionaires in emerging markets, are devastating the megafauna of the African plains.

Little has been said about the indigenous communities on the front lines of the poaching wars and the incredible work that is being done to strengthen them. These communities may hold the key to saving Africa's great animals.

But it takes work to create these protected areas. The Nature Conservancy has been helping the Northern Rangelands Trust as they form "community wildlife conservancies." The locals profit from wealthy tourists who can provide better long-term returns than the short-term gains from poaching. The communities now realize that when a rhino or elephant is killed, they are losing an asset. If welfare, education and their livelihoods are being jeopardized when an animal is killed, they won't let it happen. AMI VITALE FOR METRO

Samsung's $63 billion cash pile augurs tech takeovers

Whether or not Samsung Electronics Co. has BlackBerry Ltd. in its sights, it should spend some of its $63 billion of cash on takeovers.

Samsung, which has an alliance with BlackBerry, this month denied reports it proposed buying the Canadian smartphone maker for as much as $7.5 billion. Even so, a takeover would give Samsung the software to help its products communicate, according to Current Analysis Inc.

The $190 billion South Korean conglomerate makes dozens of consumer goods, from phones and televisions to vacuum cleaners and ovens. What it needs is technology to link all the devices together online in wireless homes of the future. Other targets include Atmel Corp. and Freescale Semiconductor Ltd., whose chips help devices talk to each other, said CM Research Ltd. The goal is to profit from what's known as the Internet of Things, a world where everyday items, from toasters and washing machines to phones and printers, are sewn together online and controlled by devices. The market for the Internet of Things could reach $7.1 trillion by 2020, research firm IDC has said.

"There are many areas in Internet of Things," from sensor technology to components, Samsung said in a statement. "Samsung regards M&A as one of our key business strategies, in conjunction with organic growth, and we continue to remain open to partnership and acquisition opportunities."

No love. Spokesmen from popular sites didn't return emails asking if they were breach victims.

User names and passwords of 20 million visitors to an unidentified dating site have been hacked and offered for sale on a website, according to a posting by the thief on an online forum used by cybercriminals.

Hackers can use the credentials to try to access bank accounts, health records or other more sensitive data, said Daniel Ingevaldson, chief technology officer of fraud-detection software-maker Easy Solutions Inc., in a telephone interview. Ingevaldson issued a statement about the breach after seeing the post, published anonymously by someone using the alias "Mastermind."

Fifty percent of the credentials were for people based in Russia, and 40 percent came from the EU. All told, the 20 million people used email addresses with 345,000 different domain names. OK, two things: First, there's no need to brag about how laid-back and easygoing your breakup is. We get it, you're so cool. Dennis Rodman wants to take Seth Rogen to North Korea

Dear friend of North Korean leader Kim Jong Un and noted crazy pants Dennis Rodman is finally — finally! — chiming in on "The Interview," the controversial Seth Rogen comedy that supposedly led to the Sony hack. "If the North wanted to hack anything in the world, anything in the world, really, they are going to go hack a movie? Really?" Rodman tells the Hollywood Reporter. And the regular visitor to North Korea has a plan to ease tensions caused by the film — or at least insert himself into the conversation. "I would ask Seth and all those involved in the movie to go to North Korea with me. And then do an interview with me about the movie." Somehow, I don't see Rogen going for that right about now.

With "The Voice" judge Blake Shelton hosting "Saturday Night Live," it's no surprise the show dipped into the country side of things with the music video "Wishin'

Mark Wahlberg victim not so hot on pardon idea

Mark Wahlberg is still seeking an official pardon for his 1988 assault of two Vietnamese men while stealing beer in the Boston area, but at least one of his former victims — from a separate violent attack — thinks that's a terrible idea. "I don't think he should get a pardon," Kristyn Atwood tells the Associated Press. Atwood was among a group of mostly black elementary school children chased and pelted with rocks by a then-14-year-old Wahlberg and his friends during a 1986 field trip. "I don't really care who he is. It doesn't make him an exception. If you're a racist, you're always going to be a racist. And for him to want to erase it, I think it's wrong." Even if it's for a really noble cause like getting a liquor license for his restaurant?

Director Bryan Singer has found some fresh blood for the younger versions of mutants Jean Grey, Storm and Cyclops in the upcoming "X-Men: Age of Apocalypse," and one of them is "Game of Thrones" star Sophie Turner, who plays Sansa Stark on the hit HBO series. She takes on the role originated by Famke Janssen in the original "X-Men" film 15 years ago. Introductions. A TV star sneaks onto the big screen in 'The Boy Next Door.'

Fans of "Pretty Little Liars" and the "Step Up" films are already familiar with Ryan Guzman, but with the sexy thriller "The Boy Next Door," a lot more people are going to get a look at Guzman — and at a lot more of him. Here's an introduction.

He's not tired of cookies — yet:

"Everybody wants to know about the cookies," Guzman says, citing a stand-out double entendre from the trailer. "As I came into New York, a couple of fans were waiting with cookies in hand. So I plan on getting as many cookies as I possibly can while the oven is still running."

He's sorry for freaking anyone out in real life:

"People get extremely scared by [his character] Noah Sandborn, so much so that when they see me in real life, they look at me a little differently. Until they actually start talking to me and realize that I'm just harmless little Ryan Guzman, there's a lot of people that are a little standoffish at first."

He knows where to look for inspiration:

"I definitely have plenty of actors that I look up to, like Marlon Brando or Tom Hardy, Christian Bale. I actually used Mark Wahlberg's 'Fear' performance as something to base Noah Sandborn on in the beginning."

Where will you see him next? As Rio in "Jem and the Holograms":

"Hopefully you like my singing. It's the first time I ever tried. I was more terrified about that than getting naked in front of the camera, let's just say that."

Here's the last thing he Googled:

"The last thing I Googled was actually the definition of translucent, which is kind of weird out of context. I was writing something at the time. I do short stories and poetry and scripts and whatnot."

Motown comes to your town

Interview. Jesse Nager, one of the stars of the Broadway hit "Motown: The Musical," talks about capturing the life of a Motown legend.

Boston is about to start feeling a little more like Motown, as "Motown the Musical" is set to open this week at the Boston Opera House. Despite its Detroit roots, the show will have at least one performer bringing a little bit of Boston to the show: Jesse Nager, who plays singer/songwriter Smokey Robinson and spent the first 10 years of his life living here, including five years in Somerville.

"I know that my mother is already planning big groups," Nager says with a laugh. While this is his first time coming with the show to Boston, he's been working on it for years, and says he loves the opportunity to bring Smokey to life. He calls Smokey and Berry Gordy, Motown's founder and the star of the show, "the yin and the yang."

"Smokey Robinson and Berry Gordy are best friends. They were years and years ago, they are still to this day," says Nager. "He's one of the few people in Mr. Gordy's world that can really always speak to him honestly."

Jesse Nager / PROVIDED

Nager has met Robinson a few times, and calls him "the nicest man I have ever met in my entire life. He is so sweet and charming."

Meeting the person you're playing onstage might be a little intimidating, but Nager says he's lucky enough to have a similar vocal register to Robinson, which helps with the portrayal, which he just tries to keep honest. "There's always a responsibility when you're playing a real character that whatever choices you make onstage dramatically have to be based in reality and what that person would really do."

Nager points to Robinson's capable songwriting as one of the reasons he's been successful for so long. "What Smokey is so good at is matching lyrics to melody. He's so good at combining the two so you never feel like the song has nothing to do with what the lyrics are talking about or the lyrics don't really reflect the mood of the song."

Easy healthy food swaps

Diet. You don't have to give up what you love — just reach for a smarter option.

Eating better is not only for those looking to lose weight. Nutrition is part of living healthier, but too often requires sacrifices of taste and beloved foods that most of us just aren't willing to make.

"Eating abundantly and including all of your favorite foods in moderation, as well as substituting healthier options, are both important to curbing cravings and enjoying the foods you love," says Jennifer Adler, a certified nutritionist and author of "Passionate Nutrition," a new memoir-cookbook about healing herself with food.

"Just remember, it's not all-or-nothing!" Adler says. "Aim to eat healthfully most of the time. Learn to live in the gray instead of black-and-white thinking that New Year's resolutions tend to trigger."

So how can you stick with your plan to make 2015 a healthier year? Choose better alternatives of the foods you already love. We asked

Depriving yourself of the foods you love is just going to lead to failed diets and binges. / ISTOCK

Adler for some healthy swaps that won't leave you feeling deprived.

1 Grab items with fewer ingredients. A shorter label means fewer preservatives, emulsifiers, colors and processing. "Choose yogurt with milk and live cultures, and ice cream with five ingredients or less," Adler recommends. A good rule of thumb: You should be able to easily pronounce all of the ingredients.

2 Eat bread, but a better kind. Adler recommends swapping sourdough or sprouted bread for your typical loaf of white bread. In these varieties, the gluten is broken down in the process of making the bread, so it becomes easier to digest.

3 For your second cup of the day, choose tea. "Instead of opting for coffee breath, nettle tea provides powerful benefits including better hair, skin and metabolism," Adler says.

4 Skip the fat-free products. Fat is not a bad word anymore. "Fat-free products are more processed and have added sugars, salts and thickeners to make up for lack of taste," Adler points out. "Opt for the original, embracing healthy fats that taste so much better, are more satisfying and great for your skin."

Moving on up. How to jump-start your career

With February just around the corner, it's easy to start slowly backtracking on your more ambitious 2015 career-related goals. But one entrepreneur stresses that everyone should still take the time to invest in their careers.

"I think the first thing is to be sure to make your goal really specific and really actionable," says Kathryn Minshew, the CEO and founder of The Muse, a career site geared toward younger workers. "For example, instead of saying, 'I'm going to find a new job this year,' you can say, 'I'm going to apply to five jobs a week.'"

Here are some other ways you can leave the traditional ways of job searching behind and start things fresh.

Have a buddy

Everything is easier when you have someone to bounce ideas off of, Minshew says. "You can agree that you are both going to check in with each other at a specific time each week," she says. It's also always good to have a second pair of eyes look over your cover letter.

Network more

"I think that networking gets such a bad rap," says Minshew. "In reality, it's all about getting to know people better." A key to successful connections, she says, is phrasing. "Instead of saying, 'Oh, I'm a writer.' You can say, 'I'm a writer who really loves writing about history.'"

Tip

Start a new project

"Try to find a hobby where you can build your skills," says Minshew. "Let's say you are looking for a job in social media. You can suggest to a local nonprofit that you will volunteer to do their social media for a few months for free, so that you can learn."

That gives people something to latch on to."

Follow up with your connections

"About 24 hours after meeting them, I'd send a follow-up email and add them on LinkedIn," says Minshew. "Then maybe two weeks later send that person a note saying hello." LAKSHMI GANDHI

How to keep work from controlling your life

Advice. Get expert tips on having a life outside of your day job — yes it's possible!

Chances are, even if you love your job, you want your life to be more than just work, work, work. But instead of using off-hours to pursue a new hobby, many either don't have the energy or are still "on," responding to constant emails.

"Technology has freed us up in many ways, but at the same time it's imprisoned us. It's very difficult to create boundaries," says Brigid Schulte, author of "Overwhelmed: Work, Love and Play When No One Has Time."

To help create boundaries, Schulte advises setting aside a certain time each day to check email and that's it. She also says that leaving work "on time" won't keep you from getting ahead. "The way you get ahead is [simply] to do really great work," she says.

The sad thing is, according to leisure researcher Roger Mannel, even when people have a block of time free, they don't know what to do with it. That leads to mindlessly watching TV, messing around on your phone and not doing anything that leaves you feeling satisfied with how you used your time.

You don't really want to be glued to your work email, do you? / ISTOCK

"There is no rule of thumb like 'X' amount of leisure time makes you feel great," Schulte says. "Control and choice are the keys." It's important to think about what you really want to do with your free time — whether it's meeting up with friends more, blogging or working out — and then setting aside a devoted time on a regular basis where you are fully immersed and not doing it while checking your phone at the same time.

Best of both worlds

What work-life balance looks like

Craig Nevill-Manning has a demanding job as an engineering director at Google, building features like their Crisis Response organization and improving the search engine's functions. But for years, he wanted to pursue another interest of his in his off-time: opening up a café. He opened Happy Bones café and has struck a balance between working full-time and tending to his passion project on the side.

"I have great partners, including my wife, and a great café manager," he tells us. "And at Google, we encourage employees to have a good work-life balance." Being honest with your managers about your outside passions and not hiding them is one key to helping you do it all; they'll respect why you are leaving work on time. "Life is all about variety," Nevill-Manning says. And developing a good work-life balance is part of that.

Letters to the editor

Racism is a widespread problem

Re: 'No justice for some' (Metro, Jan. 22); 'Obscuring the issue' (Metro, Jan. 23-25) I'd like to thank letter writer John McLaughlin for having the clarity of vision to see (and the conviction of character to express) the fact that victims and perpetrators of crimes are equally as violated and guilty regardless of the amount of pigmentation in their skin. Larry D. Fowler questions how the reporting of the case of Ms. Patricia Moran and her daughter being viciously murdered could "move us to racial healing." The same question must be posed to Rev Al Sharpton concerning the use of deceptive and dishonest tactics during his championing the case of Tawana Barwley.

MARK STEERE, VIA EMAIL

Re: 'Obscuring the issue' (Metro, Jan. 23-25) In response to Larry Fowler's letter, you have to look at more than the liberal media to be informed of news. The 2,000 Nigerians who were slaughtered were all over the news, just not CNN or NBC. In response to Mr. Montgomery, I disagree about the vicious crimes being committed by African-Americans in Florida. Not one word of outrage from the African-American community, or its leaders. How about the man who was beaten to death in Missouri by African-Americans with a hammer, for the sole reason he was white? I am not trying to defend white officers who cross the line. But the outrage is more than one-sided. Racism is a problem of all races, and the current actions are only making it worse, and for letter writer Jean Kazadi, I guess the only deaths that matter are the ones committed by police, not ethnic gangs. The African-American community is not responsible for these crimes, just like all police are not responsible for the actions of a few.

Gate deflated?

Scandal slowing to a halt

After Patriots coach Bill Belichick became a high school science teacher in a press conference Saturday, there will likely be no new information on 'Deflate-gate' for a while. The Pats said they will not comment further and the NFL will likely make their findings known after the Super Bowl. During his final discussion with the media on the subject, Belichick discussed a "study" he and his organization put together to see what could happen to a football's weight in conditions like last Sunday's AFC title game. "I believe now 100 percent that I have personally and we as an organization have absolutely followed every rule to the letter," Belichick said. The coach also denied that any Patriots player, staff member or employee participated in any tampering with the footballs in question.

First Down laser hopes to debut in NFL stadiums soon

NFL. New technology could improve game for referees, players and fans alike.

A game-changing technology could make its long-awaited debut in football stadiums in the coming year.

It just won't be inside any NFL stadiums.

First Down Laser Systems, a company that has developed a laser that projects a first-down line across the field that is visible for fans to see in the stadium and on television, is in discussion with the Canadian Football League for a test run during its season this spring.

If the company and the CFL can hammer out a deal, NFL commissioner Roger Goodell and others will be closely monitoring the implementation, performance and appearance of the technology.

"We continue to have a pretty good dialogue with the [CFL] and we are hoping to pin them down to a date and test this spring," FDLS spokesman Larry Weisman said. "The NFL will be watching what we do. We met with them a year ago last May and they told us what they liked and what they didn't like

It may be a lot easier to determine if a player has a first down soon. / GETTY IMAGES in the model we showed them.

"What they told us we took to heart. The last thing they said was they wanted to see it in live use. For us that is the next goal."

The laser system is attached to the first-down markers and beams a colored light across the field. It is similar to the yellow line that viewers see on TV. With the laser system, though, the line would also be seen by fans, players and coaches in the stadium as well.

"It gives technology a boost in the stadium that people at home already enjoy," Weisman said. "The issue the NFL has is the competition with the couch. How do you replicate for the stadium what fans are accustomed to viewing at home? The (laser) strip is one way."

First Down has already debuted the technology in two major live sporting events. For the last two years, the laser was used at the NCAA outdoor track and field championships in Eugene, Ore.

The line indicated distances for competitors in field events like the shot put, javelin, hammer throw and long jump and added another to show the leader's score.

"It was very well received by USA Track and Field and the foundation that supports it," Weisman said. "We did it in 2013 and were invited back for 2014. We expect to do it again. The fans, coaches and athletes liked it."

The technology can also be used in NASCAR to track cars, cover offside calls in soccer, pinpoint 3-pointers in basketball and even in non-sport commercial ventures. However, the ultimate goal is to get the technology inside NFL stadiums.

First Down Laser Systems hopes to take a big step later this year North of the border.

"The line has to move in the NFL and in consistent fashion and fast," Weisman said. "We are prepared for that and our technology will work in those situations. Until we do that and show the NFL that, they are going to continue to ask that question."

"They have not given us any indication of how quick they would do something. I can't speak for them but they want to see it in a live venue before they take the next step."

International hockey

Bettman says World Cup of Hockey will return

Gary Bettman formally revealed the worst-kept secret in the National Hockey League.

During his Saturday afternoon press briefing at the NHL All-Star Weekend, Bettman announced the resumption of the World Cup of Hockey. Returning to Toronto in September 2016, there will be an eight-team tournament with two four-team groupings.

The announced teams are the United States, Canada, Czech Republic, Finland, Russia, Sweden, North American Young Stars and a NHL European Select Stars.

"Our objective is to have a tournament as competitive as it can be," said Bettman, who was joined by NHLPA Executive Director Don Fehr, Boston Bruins center Patrice Bergeron, Los Angeles Kings center Anze Kopitar and Chicago Blackhawks right wing Patrick Kane. "Everything we've been focused on has been to make this a great, exciting tournament. A North American young stars team and a team of the best NHL European players from outside the big four European countries enables us to include more of the very best players in the world who might otherwise have been left out of the competition."

Bettman stressed the World Cup would be contested under NHL rules, and that the league and Players Association would be "responsible for all commercial rights associated with the World Cup."

The league and the NHLPA will reap the financial rewards of operating an international hockey tournament in North America's largest hockey city. For the league, a happier benefit to the World Cup would be the elimination of Olympic participation. DENIS GORMAN

NFL playoffs

A look back at the last Patriots-Seahawks battle

The last two Super Bowls the Patriots played in, they had played their opponent earlier that season. You don't need any reminders about how those two games went down.

This time, though, the Pats play a Seahawks team that they haven't seen in two full seasons.

Yes, the last time New England and Seattle faced each other, Russell Wilson was just a rookie, Aaron Hernandez and Wes Welker caught touchdown passes and Bill Belichick was on the grumpy side. OK, not everything has changed since then — but a lot has.

Both teams will certainly study the film from that game, a game in which the Seahawks came back to win in the fourth quarter, 24-23.

Down 23-10 in the final frame, Wilson threw two touchdown passes, including a 46-yarder to Sidney Rice with 1:18 remaining in the game to shock the Patriots.

That game was Wilson's coming out party.

"To go back to my rookie season, and to play the Patriots," Wilson said, "I truly think that was one of the biggest games for me personally, just to be able to come back against a great team and to take the lead throwing the ball to Sidney Rice. ... That was a huge comeback for us."

The loss was a shock to the Patriots, but it's clear now that

The Patriots and Seahawks haven't played each other since 2012. / GETTY IMAGES

Quoted

"I think that was kind of the momentum-starter for the past three years, really, to be honest with you."

Russell Wilson, on the Seahawks first meeting with the Patriots three years ago it wasn't a fluke. The Seahawks were just getting started — and they haven't slowed since.

It's also where the infamous "You mad, bro?" meeting between Richard Sherman and Tom Brady took place after the game. Sherman got up in Brady's face after beating the Patriots, and didn't back down from the superstar QB, who he felt disrespected his team.

This week, Sherman didn't change his tune on Brady.

"Like I said before," Sherman started, "I think people sometimes get a skewed view of Tom Brady — that he's just a clean-cut, does everything right, and never says a bad word to anyone, and we know him to be otherwise. But in that moment of him being himself, he said some things and we returned the favor."

There will be more trash talk leading up to Super Bowl XLIX, but for the first time since that game in Seattle, the Patriots will have the opportunity to respond in a meaningful way.

The Pats are credited for helping start the Seahawks' momentum back in 2012. Perhaps they can put a halt to it in 2015.
